Conventional Description of Research Papers in the Humanities

• Research papers at the undergraduate level in higher education usually take one of two forms: a paper providing coherently organized information about a specific topic or a paper presenting and supporting a specific, often controversial, claim about the topic. Page 1·Gallantry n.-Gallants collectively; gentry, fashionable people. Obs. (OED).

Page 2 “Marriage, a serious proposal” might allude to Mary Astell’s A Serious Proposal to the Ladies (1694).

“It costs four thillings in the Middlesex Journal, and three thillings in the Daily Advertiser.”-In this section the author is discussing the cost of printing the original advertisement for a husband in two periodicals including the Middlesex Journal, a publication supporting politician John Wilkes, and the Daily Advertiser, a periodical that was designed to be circulated daily throughout coffee houses and contain the latest advertisements. (Burney Database and OED).

Shilling-A form English of currency that equaled one twentieth (1/20) of a pound of sterling. One shilling equaled twelve pence, and in today’s currency puts the cost of advertising in the Middlesex Journal at about four dollars and in the Daily Advertiser at about three dollars. (OED).

Page 3·“A real fortune of £4000” which is equivalent to £612000 or $873,394.38 with today’s inflation. (http://inflation.stephenmorley.org/).“£40 per annum South-Sea Annuities”-the author is referring to the amount of money she receives per year as a result of her investment in the South-Sea Company. The South Sea Company was established in 1711 by Harley, Earl of Oxford, in order to trade with colonies in South America. However, the company was unsuccessful leading to a crash of the market in which stock fraud amongst other issues, were finally revealed. ("South Sea Company Bubble." Page 4 “...no objection to Country Life” Country Life n.-Rural life, esp. as distinct from that of the town or city. Also: the lifestyle or pursuits (such as riding, hunting, fishing, etc.) regarded as typical of landed gentry. By mentioning that she is willing to live in the country, the author is explaining that she is willing to out of the city and into the surrounding rural area (OED).

University of Pennsylvania Field Trip: Digital Images of The News-paper Wedding
Marybone (Marylebone)-a housing area containing a prominent cricket club (Olsen). Visitors would come to see the Marylebone Pleasure Gardens where people could socialize and have a good time (Bucholz, Ward 201). These gardens were an outdoor venue for concerts and other entertainments which were very popular amongst the wealthy in the eighteenth century. For an admission fee, one could wander the gardens, take in a concert, and browse a hall filled with all kinds of catered foods and deserts.
About

This site reflects the collaborative and individual work of students in ENG 400: Novels, Newspapers, and Magazines as New Media at West Chester University of Pennsylvania during the spring 2016 semester. Work included examinations of a copy of The News-Paper Wedding; or an Advertisement for a Husband, other novels published in 1774, and best-selling works such as Richardson’s Pamela and Haywood’s The History of Miss Betsy Thoughtless in the Singer-Mendenhall Collection at the University of Pennsylvania’s Van Pelt Library to experience and assess the material features of these 18th-century works.
Next Step: Students Present at Conferences

Rachel Ezrin, English and Russian

Abstract
This interdisciplinary project examines the ways that eighteenth-century new media—novels and newspapers—employed linguistic variations and dialects to convey, probe, and critique cultural and ethnic stereotypes. Specifically, it examines the novel The Newspaper Wedding and its use of newspaper classified ads to form its narrative. Analyzing the various letter-writers’ responses to ads for a husband demonstrate how language and typography are employed to both reinforce and question ethnic stereotypes. While my training in languages and linguistics informed this work, this study also benefits from my work in print and digital cultures.

Methodology
This paper analyzed the syntax, grammar, and spelling of several different letters to the author. Each letter was specifically chosen to represent a different ethnicity or class. Each letter was matched to linguistic features and stereotypes of the time. Spelling and grammar were matched to higher and lower class accents in 18th century England. Eventually, each letter was traced back to a place of origin, including: France, Tothill-Fields, Bridewell, Ireland, and Scotland.

Analysis

Dear Madam,

This is sent with my Dewsey and Tender Affect to you hoping as these few liones will not be of anye frunt to your pur Poetl that you have mad I ham A purson of a Credit abley family and Can have the best of Caracter for a sober and Indurtrus Man

The word “aney” or “any” falls in line with the Scottish pronunciation of the long e, commonly represented as /e/, and exchanges it with the “ey” sound, the closest to modern pronunciation being the “ey” sound in words such as “hey”

“...pur Pofel that you have mad I ham A purson of a Credit abley family and Can have the best of Ca- racter for a sober and Indurtrus Man Tho I lay et I nows...”

When read aloud, these lines seem to imitate someone with either an Irish or Scottish accent. The pronunciation was likely over exaggerated for humor’s sake.

Findings
These letters give us many textual clues about who these bachelors are and from where they come—clues that contemporary readers would certainly recognize. That the dialects are often overly exaggerated is for effect and often humorously intended. Thus, these epistolary texts may not accurately reflect the actual linguistics of the time period.
